Brain For Sale

At the end of his first term in Senior High School he set a new record. He failed four of his five subjects and ended up with an average of 36%. The principal gently but firmly invited him to try his talents on the world outside. Which he did and then the school went back to normal. But just before the next term started he appeared in the principal's office with a request.

"I want to start from scratch. I want to go to college. Give me this chance and you won't be sorry."

There was something in his voice and manner that made a tough school administrator weaken.

"I hope I won't be sorry," he told the boy.

He wasn't! For that boy broke all records in the school. When he graduated he had the highest average. He won every prize. And he had four scholarships offered to him by colleges But what had caused him to change?

"I'll give you my personal check for fifty dollars if you tell me what happened to you," said the principal.

"It all was because of a dream," said the boy. "In my dream the top of my head was open. I needed a brain. So I went to a brain store. They offered me the brain of a famous inventor for $1,000. That of a scientist for $2,000. Then suddenly I saw my brain, with a price tag of $10,000 on it. Why so much for my brain I wanted to know.

"Because it is an unused brain," the seller told me."

So the principal gave him a check for $60.00. The bonus he explained. "If it is true you deserve it. If it isn't — it is worth it for a story to tell at our next national conference."

Don't Fit

For two days, Junior had carefully rehearsed every word he would say to his father. And he figured out the answers his father would give him. And in turn he decided how to handle the objections So at the breakfast table he spoke in a low tone.

"Dad, we are going to have a football team. Could you get me a pair of football shoes?"

"Of course, son," was the unexpected reply. "When I come home from work, we go to the sports shop. Pick out the pair you want."

That was one of the rare times in his life that Junior was speechless. He didn't know the boss had given his dad a very big bonus. He could hardly wait until supper time. When the meal was over, they went to the sports shop. The manager took care of Junior personally. When the sale had been made, he spoke.

"Young man, if there is anything unsatisfactory, come back yourself. We will take care of it. 100% satisfied customer is the backbone of our business."

Two days later, Junior came back with the football shoes.

"Don't fit," he sighed.

The manager checked and doubled checked. Then he asked some questions: "Do they pinch at the toes? Any place where they hurt?"

Junior shook his head in the negative. The manager was very much puzzled.

"Now please explain carefully to me where they don't fit."

"In my new shoe bag," was the unexpected reply.

•••••

They say he was both the richest and the stingiest man in the state. He had millions but never enjoyed the spending of any part of his money. Many stories were told about him. They say he had an arrangement with the news man to buy yesterday's paper at half price. That he almost starved himself, though somehow he managed to live to be 87! How did he eat?

One story was that the pigeons were so sorry for him, that they would go up to him when he sat on the park bench. And feed him with the bits of bread people had placed on the ground. Others said this just wasn't true. It was the squirrels who really fed him and kept him alive. They would go to their secret warehouses under ground where they kept their supply of peanuts for the winter. And bring some back and feed him.

Once he tried to get on a bus with a transfer two days old. The driver argued and wanted to put him off. Waited until he saw the bus inspector who told the new driver:

"He happens to own this bus line!"

But the best story told about him is the day a robber held him up with a curt demand:

"Your money or your life!"

The stingy man didn't reply and this annoyed the robber who demanded an answer.

"I am thinking," he was told.

And then finally he said something that even shocked the robber.

"Take my life. I am saving my money for my old age."
